TABLE OF DIVISIONS OF THE ARYAN LANGUAGES.

THE English language—the offspring of the Anglo-Saxon—is one of the Low German dialects which form part of the Teutonic branch of the Indo-European or Aryan Languages.

The Aryan languages may be divided into six principal branches:

I. VI. INDIAN. GRECO-LATIN. TEUTONIC. SLAVONIC.

The Teutonic branch is divided into three classes, the Low German, High German, and Scandinavian:

L. Gadhelic or Erse.

1. Irish.

2. Scottish Gaelic. 3. Manx.

II. Cymric.

1. Welsh.
2. Cornish (now extinct).

3. Breton.

GRIMM'S LAW OF THE INTERCHANGE OF CONSONANT SOUNDS.

THE evidence that the group of languages known as the Aryan languages form a family that is, are all sister-dialects of one common mother-tongue—consists in their grammatical forms being the same, and in their having a great many words in common. In judging whether an individual word in one of these tongues is really the same with a word in another of the tongues, we are no longer guided by mere similarity of sound; on the contrary, identity of sound is generally a presumption that a proposed etymology is wrong. Words are constantly undergoing change, and each language follows its own fashion in making those changes. Corresponding words, therefore, in the several languages must, as a rule, in the long course of ages have come to differ greatly; and these differences follow certain laws which it is possible to ascertain. Unless, then, a proposed identification accord with those laws, it is inadmissible. We are not at liberty to suppose any arbitrary omission of a letter, or substitution of one letter for another, as was the fashion in the old guessing school of etymology.

Of the laws of interchange of sounds in the Indo-European family, the most important is that known as Grimm's Law, so called after the famous German philologist who investigated it. It exhibits the relations found to exist between the consonant sounds it three groups of the Aryan languages—namely, (1) the Classical, including Sanskrit, Greek. and Latin; (2) Low German, which we may take Gothic and English as representing (3) High German, especially Old High German, in which the Law is more consistently carried out than in modern High German.

Grimm's Law of the Interchange of Consonant Sounds.

The scope of the Law is confined to the interchanges among the following consonant sounds, which are here arranged so as to show their relations to one another:

Sharp.	Flat.	Aspirate.
Labial p	ъ	f(v)
Linguo-dentalt	d	$\mathbf{f}(v)$ $\mathbf{th}(z)$
Guttural k (c)	g	$\operatorname{ch}(h)$

The horizontal division into three orders depends on the organ chiefly used in the utterance. The differences between the vertical series are more easily felt than described. Pronounce first ip and then ib; in the first, the lips are completely closed, and the sound or voice from the larynx abruptly cut off. In the second, the lips are also completely shut, but a muffled voice is continued for a moment; it is produced by the vocal cords being still kept in a state of tension, and the breath continuing to issue through them into the cavity of the mouth for a brief space after the lips are closed. Next pronounce if; in this, although the voice-sound abruptly ceases, the lip-aperture is not so completely closed but that a thin stream of breath continues to escape with the sound of a whisper. Hence the name aspirate given to such articulations. Now, interchanges do take place between members of these vertical series—that is, one sharp takes the place of another, as in Welsh pen, Gaelic kin; or in Russian Feodor for Theodore. Such instances, however, are comparatively rare and sporadic. It is between members of the horizontal orders that interchanges chiefly take place—that is, labials with labials, dentals with dentals, &c.; and it is with these interchanges that Grimm's Law deals.

The substance of the Law may be presented in a tabular form, as follows:

(1) Classical Sharp. (2) Low GermanAspirate. (3) High GermanFlat.	Flat.	Aspirate.
(2) Low GermanAspirate.	Sharp.	Flat.
(3) High German,Flat.	Aspirate.	Sharp.

The table may be thus read: A classical sharp labral, as p, is represented in Low German by the aspirate labral f, and in High German by the flat labral b; and so of the other orders.
